Q&A Walter Bugno

By Carissa Simon, ClubsNSW Media and Marketing Manager

As President and CEO of GTECH International, Walter Bugno is responsible for GTECH's business in Asia-Pacific, the Middle East, Africa, and Europe (except Italy). GTECH is expected to acquire IGT – a move that will give the company a larger footprint in the Asia-Pacific region. Club Life spoke to the Wollongong native about the company's plans for the future and the state of the market in NSW.

CL: How will GTECH's acquisition of IGT impact its strategy?

We're awaiting the final regulatory approvals and all the shareholder approvals, and during this period we are legally obliged to continue operating as completely independent organisations. As a result, it's business as usual for both companies until the early part of 2015, when we expect the transaction to be formally completed.

GTECH's strategy has always been very clear, which is 'Putting Customers First'. It's a mandate that's been very successful for us, and we certainly see that continuing following the integration of GTECH and IGT. IGT has been an extremely successful organisation in the sector in which it has traditionally operated, and in more recent times in the social interactive space. Once the merger is completed, our strategy will be to leverage our combined capabilities and strengths and look to further enhance our position in the marketplace.

CL: You're from Australia, born in Wollongong. What, if anything, will that background bring to your role in shaping the global organisation?

Edgar Filing: INTERNATIONAL GAME TECHNOLOGY - Form 425

I've been out of Australia now for about six years, and the one thing I've noticed is that Australia generally, because of its distant and isolated geographic location, has always been open to embracing the world and fostering a global approach to business. Across a range of industries, Australia has always kept an eye on the latest trends, developments and innovations around the world, and tends to be an early adopter. In many other markets and countries around the world, which are much larger than our market here in Australia, people have always prioritised their own local market as opposed to internationalisation, at times missing real gems of opportunities. I think I've been able to lead the International region of the GTECH organisation with that same openness to embracing global trends. I think probably many Australians around the world have experienced the same thing.

CL: How does the NSW market differ from the rest of the world?

The NSW market is a very significant market in global terms, and the operators within in it are extremely efficient and knowledgeable about what is happening around the world. However, regulations that currently apply here in NSW have somewhat inhibited the ability of operators to bring the latest technology to this market. So whether it's the latest software solutions applicable in gaming, whether it's the latest content, titles, games or machines, the current regulations have made the Australian market economically unviable for many manufacturers to bring their products to this country. Here in NSW, there are good products, but not necessarily the latest products, from all the manufacturers. So I think that's the biggest difference between NSW and the rest of the world; it hasn't yet opened up to all that's available from the rest of the world, and with it, the ability to drive even more efficiency, effectiveness, control and innovation than it does today.

CL: What do you think this merger will bring to customers of the combined company?

We are on record at the time of the announcement as saying that once this transaction is concluded we will have created the world's leading end-to-end gaming company, with the most diversified product portfolio and an unmatched global footprint. Whether you're in the government-sponsored sector or in a commercial operations or gaming sector, and no matter where you are in the world, it means we will be able to provide best-in-class products and services for any channel or any market. It means that because of our respective positions in our existing markets, whether it's in the lottery solutions sector, in the interactive gaming sector, in the supply of video lottery systems and VLTs, in content or commercial gaming, the kind of scale that we have can make a real difference in delivering powerful and innovative gaming products that will help drive revenue for all of our customers.

CL: The AGE has wrapped up for another year. What did you see as the major trends for the coming years and what trends do think will come from overseas?

There's certainly an appetite in the marketplace here for new content, and for support in driving your business more efficiently and effectively through improved data gathering, analytics, and consumer understanding. I think the products and solutions being offered in systems will help tremendously with analytics and performance; these solutions provide real-live performance data that will help you drive your business better. The ability to expand the multi-game offers and have the latest content that appeals to customers – these types of product trends were attracting interest and are evidenced by success in other markets around the world.

In the longer term, and again as regulations adapt and open up, internationally we are seeing the growth of mobile gaming both in the areas of sports betting, social gaming and even real-money gaming on mobile devices – and by fastest-growing mobile devices, I don't just mean tablets, but also mobile phones. I'd be surprised if we don't see that eventually also in Australia.

CL: The Centralised Monitoring System license is coming up in December 2016. Do you see opportunity there?

I hope so! I see opportunity for both GTECH and the NSW market. As GTECH, we are a leading provider of central systems globally. We've successfully deployed more than 24 central system over the last five years, in many markets around the world that have had similar requirements to the NSW centralised monitoring system. We think we are ideally placed to offer a very good and competitive solution to the NSW Government, and to clubs and hotels here in NSW. We believe we can offer the latest technology with improved results for all stakeholders by adopting our INTELLIGEN central system. It's a system that goes beyond simply being a monitoring system by adding significant value to operations.

CL: Any final words?

GTECH has been operating in Australia for a long time, primarily in the lottery sector. With the privatisation of lotteries here in Australia, we took a smaller position in this marketplace. Today, Australia for GTECH is a very interesting and priority market for re-entry. Of course with the IGT transaction and IGT's existing position here in Australia, we really look forward to building our business and making it a major opportunity to bring our great content to the marketplace, and help drive business further for all the stakeholders in NSW and Australia.
