Internal story: Riley/Energy Delivery Quarterly Employee Meetings

Meeting Challenges Head On: Riley Recaps a Great 2012 for Energy Delivery

Over the course of four days, more than 300 employees gathered for the latest round of quarterly meetings with Rick Riley, vice president of energy delivery. Riley and his leadership team recapped a successful 2012 and answered many questions from the audience, which also included employees from other parts of the business who may be considering positions with ITC following its transaction with Entergy.

Mike Vaughan, vice president of asset management, and Jon Jipping, executive vice president and chief operating officer of ITC Holdings Corp., joined Riley and helped provide additional insight on what employees should expect upon the closing of the Entergy-ITC transmission transaction.

Hearing the status and direction of the ITC merger was most helpful, said Emily McElroy, senior analyst, transmission billing & settlement. This is on the minds of most Entergy employees right now and those updates are anticipated and appreciated. I especially appreciated the integrity and compassion with which Rick and Mike answered our questions. They were sincere and demonstrated how valuable every employee is to the transmission organization.

Dean Adams, manager, area T&S construction management, agreed.

Rick's taking time out of his busy schedule to meet with employees gives us the opportunity to understand the issues and to receive answers to individual questions around the ITC transaction, he said. Knowing where things stand in the process in addition to the timeline for regulatory approval is especially helpful.

And while the separation and merger of Entergy's transmission business into ITC was top of mind for most, Riley used the meetings to congratulate employees on a job well done in 2012. Riley noted some of the top 2012 accomplishments, including the transition of the Independent Coordinator of Transmission arrangement to a new provider - The Midwest Independent Transmission System Operator. The hand-off from the former operator to MISO took place at 12 a.m. on Dec. 1 and the transition was seamless and uneventful.

In other major news, Riley reported that the 2012 SERC Reliability Corporation audit found Entergy's transmission system fully compliant an outstanding result. SERC is the nonprofit corporation responsible for promoting and improving the reliability, adequacy and critical infrastructure of the bulk power supply systems in 16 central and southeastern states.

Riley also complimented energy delivery employees for their efficiency in meeting financial and capital improvement targets in 2012. Transmission engineering's workload increased 41 percent in 2012 from 2011, yet the team still achieved 99 percent on-time delivery.

And as Entergy gears up for hurricane season 2013, Riley used the meetings to recognize employees for their record-setting restoration performance following Hurricane Isaac last year. The Isaac storm response helped the company win the Edison Electric Institute's Award for Recovery Assistance -- the 15th straight year, every year the recognition has been awarded.

Next Steps in the ITC transaction

Jon Jipping, who has become a familiar face among energy delivery employees over the last year, talked about the upcoming steps in the transaction approval process, which include an ITC shareholder meeting on April 16 and hearings with public service commissions, beginning with Texas in late May and concluding with Mississippi in early August.

Riley, Jipping and Vaughan then answered employees' questions concerning everything from benefits to equipment and company procedures. Employees who will be moving to ITC should expect the next in the three-part series of employee bulletins from ITC next month. This bulletin will outline more info on benefits, policies and any open questions from the last round of ITC face-to-face benefit meetings.
